Working Papers

”The Spatial and Distributive Implications of Working-from-home: A General Equilibrium Model”

Abstract: I study the impact of the recent rise in remote work on households’ consumption, wealth and housing decisions, examining both short-run and long-run effects. Using detailed UK property-level housing data and a heterogeneous agent model with endogenous housing tenure and city geography, I show that remote work shifts housing demand by increasing the taste for space and reducing commuting costs. It affects where people live in the city and their housing wealth accumulation. The effects vary by access to remote work, income, and wealth. The rise in work-from-home can be compared to a city-wide gentrification shock as wealthy telecommuters opt for larger suburban homes, displacing marginal owners who turn to renting. In the long-run, work-from-home leads to the rise of a tele-premium and consumption inequality increases.

”Two-Tier Labor Markets and Durable Consumption: The Role of Risk Heterogeneity”

Abstract: This paper examines the impact of two-tier labor markets on business cycle volatility through durable consumption. To analyze two-tier labor markets and risk heterogeneity, I focus on labor contracts. I observe that, during recessions, workers on fixed-term contracts reduce their durable consumption significantly more than their permanent counterparts. I use an incomplete market model of durable and non-durable consumption with a dual labor market, where durable consumption is subject to a non-convex adjustment cost. In this framework, I highlight the heterogeneous effects of changes in upside versus downside income risk on the magnitude and persistence of durable consumption fluctuations. I also show that harmonizing contract types offers a promising tool for stabilizing the business cycle.
